mistake. That's my concern, because it may well in time be suspect to many. As...the problem is--and this is a philosophical issue--but people are getting further and further away from reality as to where their food comes from, as to where their electricity comes from, and so forth. We're facing lawsuits on the Missouri River, and part of it is that many towns are depending on that source of the river for water, they're depending on that for production of electricity, that is, the cooling towers, and still the wildlife interests are ruling. I think there's apparently room for compromise, and that's the way it should be. But there is a lot of decisions made across this country, and in the world, if you will, based on emotion rather than fact. And I don't want to open up the BSE issue, but that, as I explained the other day, is becoming...when you cave in to the emotional aspects, then you abandon the scientific side of it, and the results are not always what we would anticipate. I will fight that harder than I fought yours. I don't think there is any basis for any of those types of things. And if you think that I put forth effort in opposing yours, wait until that State Fair proposal comes before us. I shall certainly take out all of the stops. Senator Wehrbein mentioned that he didn't want to reopen the BSE debate, but when you mention that term, you do. Senator Wehrbein, there's an article that I'm going to pass around, which I'm sure you read. But there is a type of risk insurance for producers that the USDA makes available. But in the first few hours after the announcement that a Mad Cow case had been found in the United States, there was such a run on this program that the USDA shut it down and would not accept any additional
